

Alexandria Gazette

FRIDAY EVENING, SEPT. 13, 1878.

UNSELFISH HEROISM.—The heroism of Southern clergymen and Southern women has been specially vindicated since the outbreak of pestilence. The Chicago Times says that "fathers ran and left their families to perish; doctors escaped in cowardice or flight, or refused to attend fever patients unless paid, if not by the victims, out of the charity funds; but there is no instance reported from the beginning of the plague of any representative of any form of religious belief deserting his post." The same paper adds:—"There are several instances reported of fathers deserting the mother and children; not one of a mother's want of courage and devotion; and no part of the story, equally terrible and touching, of human sympathy and woman's tenderness is more beautiful, more appealing, than that of the several sisterhoods of charity and mercy—and probably others—who have given themselves up wholly to the nursing of the sick, knowing that death would be the probable reward of their labor. Most of these sisterhoods are Roman Catholic; there is one small community of Episcopalian sisters in Memphis, who have been constantly engaged in the trying task of assisting in the general work. Nor has this heroism been confined to Christians only.—One of the first victims of the pestilence at New Orleans was a Jewish rabbi, who had caught the disease while ministering to the wants of a family of his people, and the first appeal for aid sent to the North was issued by a Hebrew benevolent association." The newspapers received from the South bring constant accounts of the deaths of these devoted martyrs, whose charity and humanity are greater than their fear of death. "Not one of these useful heroes," eloquently declares the Times, "has been working for money. Not one has had any expectation of leaving the pestilential field except for the grave. Against the contemplation of such self sacrifice, the wit of the blasphemous turns pale and is silent."
